DEPORTANT PROBLEMS CONNECTED WITH SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE.

" Another problem connected with the ques tion of boundaries," observes Mr. Stille, "and perhaps, one oven more difficult of practical dution on the theory of Southern Indepennee, is the enjoyment of the navigation of the cent rivers, which rising in the free States an so long a portion of their course in the scence precariousness by which the rights to the inestimulae privileges of these "great channelof communication' so necessary of to the proparity of ten millions of freemen" (to be quaddone sovereignty, which might in any twentyour hours be pasted into hostility by the slightof motion. By a treaty made in 1795, a precarious right standed, and the was considered at the time a aget important advantage gained for the interters of the West. Happily for us, France, who Lad succeeded to the Spanish dominion of the smudry, from a jealous fear lest England might wrest this immense territory from her, thought et to sell the magnificent, prize to us, and Mr. Jofferson, with for seeing sagacity, eagerly eized the opportunity of acquiring it; this, as Mr. Everett expresses it, violating the Constiminn but founding an empire. So great ination of the Mississippi, and as our country bas increased in numbers, in wealth, and in commercial interests to a vast extent, so has the importance and value of the navigation of this of emigration setting westward in a continually swelling stream, has wrought prodigies of -necessful enterprises, that have challenged the ... the profess anticipations, as to the probable inture of this nation when the great valley of the Mississippi would team with the millions which can be therein accommodated and supported. Now can it be reasonable to suppose ber a monaent, that "this powerful race with orth a rareer before them, can tamely submit to the abandomical of this glorious beritage, or an consent to hold, at the pleasure of a foreign power, that unrestricted connecreial intercourse, which has been the foundation of all its past pro-perity, or it is the basis of all its hopes, for the future."

The idea of their doing this can only be seriously entertained by men meadened by pas-tion, as are those at the South who are now dyc-lag their hards in the blood of those who are ion, is are three at the South who are now dyong their hands in the blood of those who are desir brethren by laws of nature and of nature.
